

ALBUQUERQUE JOURNAL

16 Oct 2015

Accommodating a pet is increasingly a part of a home's design

Blu, a 5-month-old Great Dane, has his own bunk bed in his own room, which could be used for guests, as needed. His owners had their new home built with Blu, and his needs, in mind. (Gene Sweeney Jr./For The Washington Post)

By Camilla McLaughlin / Special To The Washington Post.

Friday, October 16th, 2015 at 12:02am

SANDY, Utah – Not long ago, a collar, a leash, a bowl and possibly an outdoor kennel were what most people had as pet amenities.

Today, there are designer accessories, electronic feeders, automatic pet doors, special showers and tubs, and flat-screen TVs positioned at Fido's and Fifi's heights, not to mention the ultimate luxury: a room of their own.

Some builders are making pets a centerpiece of their home designs – and buyers are responding positively.

Last year, when Standard Pacific, a builder based in Irvine, Calif., offered pet rooms as an option at a new community in Brea, Calif., prospective buyers and their pets lined up for the grand opening.

Since then, Standard Pacific has expanded such rooms and other pet amenities to all 27 of its communities. Besides the in-home features, many developments offer dog parks, exercise stations, drinking fountains, wash areas and group picnic areas for four-legged companions.

Dogs and cats are no longer relegated to the backyard, barn or musty basement. In many of the nation's 79.8 million households with animals, they are considered family.

“Pets were a theme that kept coming up” in livability research with recent buyers, says Jeffrey Lake, Standard Pacific's national director of architecture. “In one home, I actually had four dogs that piled into my lap.”

The living room of the newly built home in Sandy, Utah, features a gray area rug to match Blu's coat. (Gene Sweeney Jr./For The Washington Post)

Says Rhyse Altman, an architect designer with Visbeen Architects in Grand Rapids, Mich.: “We are finding that pet owners are growing more aware of the benefits of designing homes with pets in mind. ... The last thing a pet owner wants is to be tripping over food dishes, staring at a kennel in the middle of the living room, smelling the litter box or getting up in the middle of the night to let the dog out.”

Almost every metric – from the number of pets who go to work with their owners to the growing number of people who take their pets with them when they travel – illustrates how enmeshed pets have become in our lives. Americans’ spending on food, supplies and veterinary services reached an all-time high last year and experts are projecting that the number will surpass $60 billion this year.

The demographics of pet ownership are beginning to shift toward millennials and younger owners who, according to a survey by the American Pet Products Association, tend to spend more and pamper their pets more than their parents and grandparents did.

Although baby boomers were the ones who really set the pet-pampering trend in motion, millennials are expected to dote even more on their pets, which means that, in future years, the term “pet amenities” might take on an entirely different meaning.

“Whatever people want for their pets, they are going to get,” says Rhona Sutter, a real estate agent in Naples, Fla., who founded the Pet Realty Network, which helps prospective buyers find pet-friendly properties. “Pets are something buyers definitely take into consideration now.”

For one couple outside Salt Lake City, pets were an important consideration in the design of an entire house.

Blaine Raddon and Stacy Johnstun made sure their home's design accommodates their pup, a Great Dane named Blu. (Gene Sweeney Jr./For The Washington Post)

Even though Blaine Raddon and Stacy Johnstun didn't have a dog when they first thought about building, they said having a pet was a part of their life vision.

During the months-long process of designing the home with architect Russ Platt, they made accommodating a dog or two, and potentially a very large dog, a priority.

Early on, they decided on a breed – Great Dane – but their puppy, a blue male they named Blu, didn't come on the scene until they were selecting their finishes, tile and flooring.

Located in Little Cottonwood Canyon in Sandy, Utah, the home is a striking contemporary that edges into the steep slope of the canyon's hillside. Huge windows take in views of granite peaks to the north, the green of the surrounding forest and elevated views across the valley to the city in the distance.

A line of clerestory windows above the great room infuses even more natural light to both levels of the home. Telescoping doors made up of double-wide sheets of glass open the great room and the second-floor master bedroom to covered decks. The property has an underground electronic fence for Blu and includes natural spots for him to play.

A large walk-in tub for Blu's bathing needs is also equipped to be a shower for a handy rinse. (Gene Sweeney Jr./For The Washington Post)

Inside, few areas were conceived where Blu wasn't a consideration, beginning with the concrete floors in dark gray tones, a perfect match for his coat. "Great Danes really don't shed very much, but we picked these floors so any shedding would blend in,” Raddon says.

Flooring is one concern for homeowners with pets. Many prefer hard surfaces or even some specialized floors marketed as pet-friendly. Raddon also opted for hard surfaces on the second floor, selecting a gray and tan Daltile that mimics natural wood. It’s one of those materials that must be touched to be sure it is tile.

Just outside the kitchen on the patio, an extensive butler’s pantry is accessed through an electronic pet door. The pantry is hidden behind a brick wall that comprises the back of the kitchen and runs the length of the room.

Here, Raddon installed a feeding table where Blu eats, and his food and accessories are stored. The electronic pet door opens in response to a magnetic key on the dog’s collar, but otherwise remains closed, keeping critters out of the house.

Blu’s owners planned their house for a dog before they got him. (Gene Sweeney Jr./For The Washington Post)

Raddon’s house includes dual offices on the main level that share a bathroom with a walk-in shower that Raddon uses as a dog-washing area. The location is just off the garage; another outdoor patio is also nearby. A bedroom on the second floor has been outfitted to be a hangout for Blu.

It has been a few months since Raddon, Johnstun and Blu moved into their new home.

“The dog settled into the house quicker than we did. It took him less than a day to figure out the pet door and the fence,” Raddon says. “Now, he feels like he is the king of the castle.”